GENERAL REMARKS.

In these closing remarks, the several School Boards have endeavored to call your attention to those things, which, to their minds, required attention. Last year we spoke of the rapid increase in the number of weeks of school and the number of branches taught.

Everything calls for advance, even nature gives us abundant examples. Every tree grows larger each year and when it ceases to grow it dies and gives its place to another. Our children grow bodily each year, and no fond parent would wish them to be always children. Every man financially is growing richer or poorer. Our farms under our hands are growing better or worse. Our schools, all things considered, ought to be growing better. We are fully persuaded that in book learning they are growing better. Is book learning all? Are there not other things that should be inculcated and insisted upon that are of as much value in after life, as what we get from books? Our schools should be a place of progress towards a higher life, socially and morally. A place where all our children, in going from the home life, to mingle with those of other homes, should learn and practice the Golden Rule. A place where all their intercourse, in the school house, at their play or going to and from school, should be gentlemanly and lady-like. Profanity and vulgarity in word or action should be strictly prohibited and rigidly enforced, and grace and ease of deportment should be constantly practiced and become a concomitant of their lives. Let me illustrate: Two young men apply for a situation of trust and remuneration, and the employer requires a recommendation from some official, or some person they know confidentially. They say of one. "He is a good scholar, but has been given to profanity and vulgarity." Of the other. "He is not a brilliant scholar, but his habits are correct, and his manners always gentlemanly." Two girls apply for a desirable place with good pay, and the recommendations read. "This one is a fine, quick scholar, but her manners are boisterous, bold, and unladylike." "That one is not a quick scholar, but diligent; her manners are easy and ladylike." Which of the two boys or girls will obtain the situations? It will not take you long to decide. Which character would you like for your children and those with whom they associate to cultivate?

The youthful character will go with us through life. Someone has said. "It is easier to learn new tricks than to forget those already learned."
